What are the prospects for the left in the U.S. in the coming years? How have black and Chicano politics changed in the 1970's? What is (and isn't) new about Eurocommunism? What has happened to the socialist feminist women's movement? What do Marxists have to say about mass media and popular culture? What did this year's miners' strike mean for the labor movement?

Socialist Review has been posing these questions, trying to develop an approach that is fresh and undogmatic. Socialist Review brings together a wide range of both left activists and left theorists from around the world to discuss changes in American political developments. We demand of our articles that they be informed by the latest developments in Marxist and other theoretical work, that they be freed from sectarian polemics, and that they pose their positions in terms of contemporary conditions and possibilities.

For almost ten years, Socialist Review has been at the forefront of discussion and debate, printing some of the best work the left has produced. Socialist Review was one of the first left journals to explore the fiscal crisis of the state; the relationships among capitalism, the family, and personal life; the meaning of the emergence of Eurocommunism; and the decline of the post-war liberal consensus in the U.S. -- and to look at the new political forces now appearing.

(over please)

Socialist Review is notable for its diversity. For example, our most recent issue contains:

-  A symposium on prospects for the left in the U.S.: Judy MacLean, Michael Harrington, and Mike Davis respond to a major article by Harry Boyte.
-  An analysis of the Chicano movement in the 1970's, by Richard Garcia.
-  A discussion of the recent UMW strike and its meaning for both the miners and the labor movement as a whole.
-  A critique of modern legal theory.
-  Plus reviews of important new works on New York's financial crisis; the modern family; and the history of popular movements in France.
